I was thinking about the efficiency of an evapotranspiration (ET) system that was in a research facility, and wanted to compare it to an alternative. I selected the Indiana University Libraries' e-ET (evapotranspiration) system and the Duke University Libraries' e-ET (evapotranspiration) system. A "reference system" is needed to establish a baseline; I selected one for each organization. I assumed that both groups of ET systems were running accurately, so I took the ET estimate from each system at 10:15 am each day for the four-day period from January 2 to January 5, 2013, and compared the two. The results of that comparison are shown below:

Reference System	Alternative System	e-ET	e-ET ET (The system identifiers are from the header, though I reversed the order, since I always look at the header first.) The two systems were nearly equal in terms of the average value of ET estimates. However, the reference system estimated much more ET. As a result, the alternative system has a higher net efficiency; it removes significantly more water per unit of water removed. This was a smaller-than-normal ET event, so it is possible that the results would have been more significant if the reference system had been present in the alternative system, even with only a few days' data, but I didn't investigate that. In any case, it seems that, for our purposes, using the alternative system is probably the best option. -Dan Article in IEEE Spectrum from January
